Between This Air (Transcript)

[00:51]
Julian: If I say black bodies and breathing, what comes to mind?

Ellah: That idea of just how important the black body is because this is what we have. You know, people see us and they see a history, they feel they know something or understand something that is not about ourselves as individuals but about what has been done to us.

Julian: leave and let me breath as though I work this land as though the earth is one with my beating heart we the generation digging deep for a breath leave and let me breath walk as though every step is alive as though I wore this flaming heart filled with a soulful sonnet and a blues hot tongue to speak with leave and let me breath as though I was born I can speak let my lungs testify to persuade my soul matters let me stay visible to live as though a life is a life is a life how many lives a Nigger got to give before you call him a man? how many depths do you need to dig to know how deep his soul is? The revelation is in your chest.

Ellah: Finding those spaces that allow you to breathe deeply. And to be conscious of that growth and of how life-giving it is.

[4:05]
Ellah: *Hold on things or the people that allow you that space to breath and as I get old you need to feel safe in order to properly exhale.

[04:26]
Jason: I’ve always had trouble with the term black bodies. But, I guess, I’m meant to have that problem. As in, you know, we’re not just bodies, we’re not just this thing that we see. You know, spoke in an objectifying way. So, you know, everytime I hear it I’m slightly challenged or confronted by it. But, again, on reflection I think I need to be challenged by it because in a sense I’m almost seeing it from a perspective of the other. Because we are objectified by others, so maybe where it kind of plays on that term we’re co-opting, you know, we’re kind of disempowering their kind of perspective of us.
Ellah:
There is something there where he’s saying that, you know, this suppression has been about not allowing us to breathe, not allowing us to be. And so a violence as you say, an erasure, that goes beyond the killing of that particular body, a separation of families. Say ‘Yes, I am still breathing, I am still here.’

Julian:
leave and let me breath as though I work this land
as though the earth is one with my beating heart
we the generation digging deep for a breath
leave and let me breath
walk as though every step is alive
as though I wore this flaming heart filled with a soulful sonnet and a blues hot tongue to speak with leave and let me breath as though I was born
I can speak let my lungs testify to the way my soul mutters let me stay visible to live as though a life is a life is a life
how many lives a Nigger got to give before you call him a man?
how many depths do you need to dig to know how deep his soul is?
how many?
The revelation is in your chest
Call me a flowering mouth spreading seeds
a party of light
in the dark a cradle cry
we are, we are, we are quintessential to your future
I say leave and let me play the lucky hand
As I walk this land not as a Nigger but as a man
not as a refugee but as one in one earth
I say leave and let me breath
leave and let me breath
I say leave and let me
I say leave and let me
I say leave and let me breath

Jason:
Time frames of ourselves, where we can see the future, we’re not afraid of it. Because we’re already there.

Julian:
We are what’s left (one life)
what’s left (one life)
what’s left (one life)
what's left of us
a remembrance of the past
(one life)
this air is a remembrance of the past because each time is the first time the air has left for good

[11:07]
Ellah: There is something there where he's saying that, you know, this oppression has been about not allowing us to breathe, not allowing us to be.
